CREDIT RECOVERY

Why Credit Recovery Courses Are Important

Failing to graduate high school on time can take a significant emotional toll on a student. They may experience feelings of disappointment, frustration, and even shame, comparing themselves negatively to peers who are moving on to the next stage of their lives. This delay can lead to a sense of being "stuck" or left behind, impacting their self-esteem and confidence for years.

By allowing students to make up missing credits, Copperstone Credit Recovery keeps them on track to earn their high school diploma, which is increasingly important for future educational and career opportunities.

US Diploma Program

About the US High School Diploma

A US high school diploma is a certificate earned after successfully completing four years of secondary education, typically from grades 9 through 12.

While there isn't a single national curriculum, each US state sets its own requirements, which usually include core subjects like English, mathematics, science, and social studies, along with elective courses. Students earn credits by passing these courses, and the diploma signifies they've met the state's standards for graduation. Accredited US high school diplomas from reputable schools are widely recognized by universities in the United States and institutions across the world as a qualification for higher education.

Why is a US High School Diploma Important?

A US high school diploma gives international students a global advantage. Its flexible, well-rounded curriculum develops critical thinking and diverse skills, while accreditation ensures recognition by universities worldwide. This combination opens broader higher-education opportunities and enhances prospects with international institutions and employers.
